The Story...

For centuries, the rain-soaked forests of Kerala and the rich spices they grew, has attracted explorers. Legend has it that ancient Phoenicians traded with the southwest coast of India, and sailors from the Malay Peninsula are believed to have reached Kerala as early as 350 BC for spices like cardamom, cinnamon and black pepper. While most of the young Jewish community have now moved out in search of better opportunities, old timers near the charming synagogue recount legends of King Solomon's men who came in search of trade-teak, ivory, peacocks, and spices.

"The seafacing land was the byword in ancient times for exotic trade of a cosmopolitan nature which brought the foreigner to the shores even as far back as the third millennium BCE.

The coastline supported by a hinterland laced with waterways had everything that facilitated the growth of a littoral civilization," "The nomadic pre-Islamic tribes of central Asia and Jews were among the first who came to Kerala for trade. Traders took Kerala's native spices and other commodities that had arrived at the port from the East across the great expanse of the Indian Ocean to Africa and Arabia, and from there, to points farther west."
